ERE are shown three boatloads of marines after leaving the battleship Michigan in Vera Cruz harbor and making their way for a landing. Battleships are seen in the background. The landing of these marines was regarded as full of danger, although they were protected by the big guns of the fleet in the harbor. While the small force of defenders in the Mexican city fired several volleys at these small boats, in most cases their aim was bad. Meanwhile the big guns of the fleet were trained on the places from which the fire on shore was directed and did their part in silencing the defending forces.
